The GUERRILLA PAINTER Story

by Carl Judson

I was managing a cattle ranch in Colorado when I took up plein air painting back in the early 80s. I had come across Winston Churchill's essay, "Painting as a Pastime" in which he prescribes painting as therapy for stress and overwork. Since I was stressed and overworked, and Churchill is a pretty good persuader, I took to painting.

No sooner had I taken up my newfound pastime than it dawned on me that the last thing I wanted was to have one of my cowboys catch me in the act. Fortunately, I came across a little book that had some illustrations of a small portable painting rig, called a pochade box. Now that was the ticket!

So I made one small enough to hide under my pickup seat. It was as cute as a bug's ear and worked great – none of the ranch hands found out my secret.

By the time I coined the term "guerrilla painter" I had been doing volunteer rural development work in Central and South America for several years. In my spare time I had been sneaking around with my homemade pochade boxes, capturing the unsuspecting world around me in little oil paintings. It was only a matter of time before I began thinking of myself as a guerrilla painter. One thing led to another and before I knew it, my son, Arthur and I had started the company that makes the popular Guerrilla Painter® Pochade Boxes.

Today, Guerrilla Painter is the leading manufacturer of products for artists who travel and paint out of the studio.

PLEIN AIR

“Plein air” is a French term used by painters in the 19th century (and since) to describe painting done outside on location instead of in the studio. A less common term sometimes used in English for paintings done outdoors is “alfresco,” but in Italian it apparently has different meanings, including “to be in the cooler” (in jail).

The Impressionists believed in the merits of painting en plein air, and much of their work was done outdoors. Originally a French movement, plein air painting quickly spread to the rest of Europe, America and Russia.

Among the many famous 19th century painters who painted extensively outdoors before and after the Impressionists are Constable, Turner, Corot, Manet, Cezenne, Gauguin, VanGogh, Whistler and Sargent.

Mary Cassatt, Georgia O’Keefe, Edward Hopper, Rockwell Kent, Fairfield Porter, Alex Katz and Wolf Kahn are a few examples of the many 20th century painters whose work continued to be influenced by plein air practice and tradition.

POCHADE BOX

“Pochade” means something like “quick sketch” in French. A pochade box is the one essential piece of equipment a “Guerrilla Painter” needs - a compact, portable painting studio in a small box. Traditional pochade boxes have three simple parts:

- A hinged lid that works like an easel and wet painting carrier combined.
- A palette that lifts out or slides to one side or is in the bottom of the box itself.
- Compartments to hold paints and brushes, etc.

Pochade boxes were used by 19th and early 20th century landscape painters, but they were pretty much extinct by the mid 1980s. Traditional pochade boxes came in all shapes and sizes. Some of the little ones with thumb holes in the bottom were jury-rigged from recycled cigar boxes. Most pochade boxes were used for oils, but they were made for pastels and watercolors as well.

With a pochade box, you can get everything you need (and then some) into one small, compact package so that you can take it anywhere you want to go without a hassle. Obviously, getting everything into one box means compromise. (Who said a guerrilla’s life is easy?) There are lots of ways of getting around this limitation, but if the point is to paint more paintings in more places, why fight it? It’s pretty hard to argue with the convenience of being able to open the lid of your pochade box and start painting. When you’re done, close the lid and take off.
